

Eco-friendly initiatives towards ever greater sustainability

Bolia is on a never-ending sustainable journey. For several years now, the Danish company has been taking numerous initiatives to promote the environment and eco-responsibility, as is the case with MÅLBAR, for example. MÅLBAR has developed a climate analysis tool dedicated to the furniture sector, with the aim of guiding brands towards reducing the greenhouse gas emissions of their products. Bolia's new Lookbook has a carbon footprint that equals slightly less than a regular paper wrapped cheeseburger, for example. Many more tests are on the drawing board, aiming for an even higher level of transparency - currently the Swing chair, before many other designs will follow.

Bolia also relies on Schneider Electric, a French company that provides software, hardware and services for energy management to meet increasingly complex global energy requirements. Thus, Bolia is on their way towards ensuring that its energy consumption is as clean as possible and adapted to an ever-changing world.

The brand is furthermore starting a collaboration with Mycelia, a small Oslo-based bio-design company. Combining science and design, Mycelia strives to create materials that do not harm the health of people and the planet, developed in mycelium, the root structure of fungi, and using low-value waste that then finds a second life.

Last but not least, Bolia works in close collaboration with Solaris, a B2B collaborative platform for recycling and upcycling projects.

Through these initiatives, Bolia supports its commitment to an ever more sustainable furniture.
